SISSY STUFF?

SEVERAL boys his own age eyed Timmy occasionally with hostile stares. A new kid was something they didn't like on this block. It was hardly Tim's fault that his father's plant had moved to the city and he had to go with it.

He got up from the steps restlessly and walked to the curb and watched a game of stickball with little interest. The game broke up shortly and the gang gathered around a dark-haired boy in a pair of faded blue denims. Timmy listened as the boy told them all what they'd do next. Whatever he said seemed to be all right with them. One fellow objected and was cuffed behind the head to change his mind.

Tim grinned. The guy was evidently the leader of the gang and made sure everyone knew it. Too bad he was like that though. He might have been a nice guy. One little kid of twelve or so hung on the edge of the gang hoping to be included in their activities, but the leader chased him off.

"Aw, why can't I go with you, Spike?" he pleaded.

"Because we don't want any kids around," the leader snapped back. "Now go on . . . scram!" The gang drifted off, leaving the boy standing there. Tim was several years older, but he knew how the kid felt.

"Hey," he called. The boy turned around. "What's the matter, don't they like your looks?" Tim's smile was so disarming that the boy grinned back.

"Naw," he replied, "they always boot me out when there's something doing. They're going down and swipe apples from Tony's stand and they don't think I can run fast enough to get away."

"That doesn't sound like much fun," Tim told him. "Suppose they get caught, then what?"

"Arrested maybe . . . after Tony wallops them some. They got to do it, though; otherwise Spike'll give it to them." By that time the two boys had become quite friendly. They introduced themselves and Tim found out the fellow's name was Jack Selby. They discovered a mutual interest when they began talking about model planes, and Tim took his new friend to his room to show him what he had built.

Together they sat down and started working on a new kit Tim's father had brought home for him the night before. Tim pointed to a P-51 model hanging from the ceiling. "I got my Tenderfoot Air Scout insignia with that," he told Jack. He went on to explain how the Boy Scouts had air scouting as part of their program, and was surprised to learn that Jack had never been a scout.

"Would you like to be one?" he asked.

"You bet," Jack said enthusiastically. Then his voice dropped. "Guess I'd better forget it. I'll never be able to get the money for a uniform."

"Sure you can," Tim laughed. "You can get a job after school, and in the meantime you can wear an old one of mine that I outgrew." Tim went to the closet and pulled out his other uniform. His friend tried it on eagerly. A scout was born!

They joined the neighborhood troop together. In the next few weeks that followed the two boys were inseparable. Tim taught his buddy how to play the bugle and before long he sounded the calls at every meeting. After school Jack worked delivering orders for a grocery store. It was a proud moment for him when he had enough saved to buy himself a new uniform. The two of them took the bus to the heart of the city and entered a store. When they emerged, Jack was clutching a box tightly under his arm. The weekly meeting was tonight, and he wanted to turn out in his new finery.

That evening Jack called for Tim, his bugle in his hand. On his hat was the badge of a second class scout. Tim, a first class scout himself, appraised his friend and said, "You've done a swell job, Jack. The boys in the troop have all earned their money to buy uniforms and it sure helps you appreciate the value of money."

They walked downstairs and decided to take the subway instead of the bus. This brought them past the corner where the gang hung out. Neither of them had seen much of the other boys since they had engaged in their scouting activities, but they didn't care, since they had found plenty to do in this new troop.

Spike was the first to spot them. He laughed arrogantly at their uniforms. "Hey, will you look at the sissy. Boy Scouts . . . ha!" The kids stepped out for a better view and laughed with him. Tim felt Jack go tense. His friend knew they were going to have to run the gauntlet of criticism and didn't like it a bit, especially since the other fellows were bigger than he was and he could do nothing about it.

However, Spike singled Tim out as the butt of his jokes. "Where you think you're going, sissy pants?" he said harshly. Tim grinned at him.

"To a scout meeting . . . Knothead!" He heard a gasp go around at the name. No one had ever dared call Spike anything like that. Jack poked him to keep quiet, but Tim was still grinning. They went to walk past the group, but Spike, a leer on his face, caught his arm and spun him around.

"What did you say to me?" he demanded.

"I think," Tim said slowly, "that if you can't hear, you'd better wash your ears. I called you a knothead. Why?" Spike's face was close to being purple with rage. There were a few titters behind his back and he couldn't stand having the gang laughing at him.

"Why? Say . . . are you a wise guy? I ought to slap you down! Maybe you'd like to fight me, huh?" Tim laughed in his face.

"Maybe, but not now. We have to get to the meeting."

Spike put his hands triumphantly on his hips and smirked. "So, you're yellow, aren't you? And a wise guy at that." He looked around. The others were nodding their heads knowingly. "I think I'll slap you down anyway," he continued. "I didn't like those names. Circle 'em, gang." The kids ran to positions around Tim and Spike to make sure Tim didn't try to run off. Spike whipped off his shirt and threw it on the ground. "Don't you want to take off that pretty uniform so it don't get messed up?" he sneered.

"I don't think it will," Tim grinned. His adversary frowned. He couldn't quite make this guy out. He should be afraid but he wasn't. A sudden rage swept over him and he lowered his head and charged. The next second there was the sound of a fist hitting a chin and Spike was flat on the sidewalk. He looked up amazed . . . the circle of kids stared in wonder at their fallen leader.

Spike came up with a roar. His fists flailed out, but never reached the target. The dancing figure in khaki eluded him every time. There was another solid blow, and once again Spike came to a skidding halt on the cement ground. He shook his head but it wouldn't clear. "Had enough?" Tim asked.

Spike nodded. "Nuff . . ." he stammered out. Both Tim and Jack turned and walked through the kids. They made no effort to block their path. As a matter of fact, they wanted no part of a guy who could lick Spike like that.

But at that moment one said, "Say, do they teach you that in the Scouts?"

"No," Tim smiled, "but they do teach you to keep yourself fit!"

He was surrounded now. "Do you think we can join too?" one asked.

"Sure, come down now and sit in on a meeting. You'll enjoy it."

The next moment the gang trooped off arm in arm for the meeting rooms. Spike, still on the ground, watched them leave. He was a good loser. "Hey," he yelled, "wait for me. I want to go too!"
